

Kent State on a College Visit

I visited Kent State University. We began in the student center with the alma mater plastered on the walls and more squirrel statues than ones of the school mascot. We began walking around the campus and made a quick stop at the language building mostly comprised of students and teachers involved in english or foreign languages. However, random classes can be smashed into this building due to construction occurring on the campus. We then walked around the beautiful campus with all the trees turning orange as the guide pointed out the psychology and architecture building while telling us about the types of majors that we could pursue that would land us in that building. As we pressed on through the biting winds of northern Ohio, the tour guide told us the story of why the squirrels are so big on the campus. She began relaying a story about a biology professor and his assistant who traveled to Canada on business. Once they finished what they needed, they headed back home. However, with more luggage than they came with. Under a blanket rest twelve canadian black squirrels being smuggled into the americas for "research". Once they got back to campus, they broke out and the Professor dubbed it a "social experiment". After the story we arrived at the stage dormitories that came equipped with furniture that can be arranged any which way as long as the mini fridge and full size microwave have a place in the room. We soon ended in the food hall located at the bottom of the dormitory building that allows students to get food any time without leaving the building.

Kent State comes equipped with many features a student doesn't necessarily need but what everyone student wants.
