

Career Profile of a Histopathologist

To be a histopathologist, you should first know what you're getting into. Histopathology is a lot of lab and hands on work. It's definitely not a job for everyone. You have to have patience to stay in a lab most of the time and be able to handle some things other people may not have the stomach to handle. To begin with, you should probably study medical sciences in college, although it isn't necessarily a requirement. You will need to understand anatomic pathology and clinical pathology. To advance in this career, you really just need to stay in the career. You can become a specialist in certain kinds of research, however, the only true way to "advance" is to just stay in the field for a long time.

Works Cited

"Forensic Pathology Careers: Frequently Asked Questions." Forensic Pathology Careers FAQ. 13

Nov. 1999. Web. 19 Oct. 2016.